

JUDGE CLAYTON.—His honor has so often changed sides and shifted positions, that he reminds us of the old man's breeches, that had been patched so often, it was difficult to tell the original stuff that composed them. These changes have given him a kind of publicity, by which, it seems, from the following article, he is known abroad as well as at home:

"Et tu Brute!—Mr. Clayton, of Georgia, who recently turned from bad to worse, by leaving Jacksonism for Nullification, arraigned the Greatest and Best in no measured terms, a few days since, in his speech against the Enforcing Bill in the House of Representatives. He said that the President was an unsafe depository of power—commented with severity on Gen. Jackson's letter to Mr. Monroe, in which he declared his readiness to hang the members of the Hartford Convention under the second section of the Rules and Articles of War; adverted to his unauthorized Proclamation to the Spaniards in Florida, warning them to quit the territory—and earnestly appealed to the House not to trust power in the hands of a man who had always abused it, whenever it had been committed to him!—And yet this same Augustine S. Clayton was not only a strenuous supporter of General Jackson long after these abuses of power were commenced, but within the space of the past year pronounced on the floor of the same Congress one of the most unqualified eulogiums upon the President, that servile adulation has presumed to utter!"—*N.
