

☞ The State Rights Sentinel thinks that "the places of Wilde, and Gilmer, and Foster, and Clayton, have not been filled by any portion of the present representation in Congress." Their seats have been occupied, doubtless, but if the editor means that our delegation have not filled its seats in the same manner as that which preceded it, we perfectly agree with him. We trust in heaven it has not. We know what our present members are—they are straight forward, unflinching republicans, who do their duty because it is their duty; and know how to do it quite as well as their predecessors. With talents and integrity fully equal to those whose places they have taken, we find them exerting their energies for the good of their country—not professing one thing to-day and another to-morrow, and boxing the political compass as their cupidity, or the popular breeze directs. Won't the Sentinel try again?
