From a Philadelphia paper.

If there ever had been a doubt as to the British acting on the offensive in the north-western frontier, the dispatches of general Wayne, read in congress the 21st day of November last, put the affair beyond question.

At Fort Recovery, a great number of British soldiers, with their faces blacked, assisted in the attack. Three British officers kept at a distance behind the assailants, and directed the operations. Twenty-two Americans were killed, thirty wounded, and three missing. If any circumstance could add to the atrocity of this behavior on the part of our quondam mother country, it is that these poor savages were led into the field with the greatest reluctance. Like the warrior, in the poems of Ovid, these people said to the British incendiaries, "the desert is enough for us, with all its deer and woods." Yet that nation could not suffer these tribes to rest.

The blood of the slain Indians, therefore, as well as that of the Americans, must, at the great day of reckoning, stand in the creditor column of England.

It is impossible to conceive any other species of crimes that places the authors in a light at once so atrocious and contemptible. Were Wayne to enter Canada, at the head of ten thousand men, which we are very far from hinting that he ought to do, the whole British government in that country would crash like an egg below the nether millstone.
